"What's the matter? What are you shut up here for?" was his greeting.

"I don't know, doctor," feebly responded the business man. "I am going to die."

The old physician examined his pulse and inspected his tongue.

"No trouble. There—you're all right," he said.

"But my temperature," persisted the sick man. "You haven't taken my temperature in the park. An hour before the umpire called out the familiar "Play bell," juily three thousand persons were present, and it was estimated that sons were present, and it was estimated that sons were present, and it was estimated that

CINCINNATI, April 27.—A bright, clear, sunshiny day, after two weeks of almost incessant rain, was a sight that gladdeed the hearts of Cincinnati's baseball patrons, who crowded the park this atternion eager to be present when the gong sounded to start the great championship race.

There was no special ceremony. A concert was given at the park before the game by Weter's brass band. Boxes were set apart for the leading city officials and special provision made for all out-of-town visitors.

Iromptly at 3.15 the Chicago and Cincinnati learns took their places, and the crowd the first man stepped up to bat.

she did look tired. He felt her pulse. It beat rather fast. He took her temperature. It was 125 degrees.

"Why, you are very ill," he said. "You should be at home and in bed. Your temperature is 125 degrees."

Dr. Blank looked anxious.

"There isn't anything the matter with that thermometer, is there?" Mrs. A. asked.

Daniel Quigley, the kroom's brother, was best man, and Kate Davidson, a sister of the bride, was bridesmail.

The happy couple are now on their wedding to a guard at the Machinery Hall Annex at 9 o'clock in the evening and began to jabbe and gesticulate in an excited manner. They were evidently in much trouble about some

"Well," asked the guard, "what is it you "Well," asked the guard, "what is is you want here this time of night?"
"Yes," they responded in chorus.
"Do you understand what I say?" was the next question.
"Yes," came the response.
"Then tell me what you want."
"Yes," they all said again.
"Well, what is it?"
"Yes," responded the Arabs.

Yes," responded the Arabs.

"Is that all you can say?" And there came another "yes" in response.

The guard remarked that he thought so, but continued to talk to them, and every time he stopped to take breath there came to his ears their monotoneus "yes," like the response in a mostem litany. All the time they seemed to be very much excited, and the guard concluded they had lost their way.

Such was the fact. They had been wandering about the grounds since dusk and had become so impressed with the magnitude and magnificence of the buildings that by the time they reached the machinery hall sanex they were utterly bewildered and did not know which way to turn. The guard, when all this dawned on him, sent for the patrol waron and toil them all to get in.
